"Blue Penitence"

Executions were scheduled at dawn. The day before, the condemned man received two anonymous visitors dressed in long, blue coats that reached down to their ankles. Over their heads they wore a coarse blue sack, slit at the eyes. They invited the prisoner to join their company, la Compagnie des Pénitents Bleus, and, if he accepted, they accompanied him to the scaffold, while a third brother, whom they perchance did not mention to the prisoner, brought up the rear, carrying a large basket lined with cloth.

The following morning, at five a.m., the whole Company of seventy two Penitents assembled at the place of execution. The prisoner had received the last rites, and once the "ceremonies" were dispatched the Companions took away the pieces... and buried them.

The Order of the Blue Penitents of Aix dates from 1645, when Messire Arnaud, Canon of the Cathedral of St. Sauveur, bought and donated to their purpose the chapel of the Oratorians in the rue des écoles. In 1653 the king authorized its members to enter the Aix prison and, for over two and a half centuries, particularly in the peak season of the guillotine, business was brisk.

In 1771 Jacques de Laurens, the Superior of the Order, purchased and donated to it, the houses immediately to the north of the old chapel of the Oratorians. A new chapel, dedicated to St. Joachim, was erected, much larger than the old; it was oriented anew, with its entrance facing the rue du Bon Pasteur. The 'Chapelle' was a splendid building, richly decorated, much admired.

In 1782 a hospice for the blind and a home for retired clergy were added to the charges of the Compagnie, which was promoted to maison royale hospitalière. At about this time, the remains of Saint Dédéjot were buried there. What they had been doing during the past thousand years or how they found their way to Aix, is not recorded. The chapel bears no recognizable trace of the saint's arrival though its truth has been asserted often enough to render refutation tempting.

In 1905 the Blue Penitents were put out of business by the State, their duties being assumed by that stalwart body of functionaries known as Pompes Funèbres Générales. The last religious ceremony of the Order was held on a rainy Ascension Day in 1912, when the remaining forty Penitents left the Chapel St. Joachim to join the Grey Penitents, les bourras (the bags!), of the rue Lieutaud.

Behind the bare facts the questions remain provocative and entire. The records of the Compagnie are lost; we can only conjecture how, and why, seventy two citizens of Aix dedicated themselves to their lugubrious task. Braving public opinion as they braved their own feelings, they gave men in their last moments, the dignity and brotherhood that they had forfeited; perhaps, even, love and hope beyond the grave.

The skull sitting in my office once belonged to a Penitent: a murderer, or a saint, maybe both. One can never quite tell with Blue Penitents.
